

I heard an interview on NPR this morning, and was interested to hear one of the reasons for this action was that cable TV viewing represents something like 80% of the viewership. Doesn't that tell you something? That programming offered on regular TV stinks? And that people are making the choice to pay for better programming? And therefore are willing to pay for better programming and not programming that is just fed to them by powers that control the networks? Keep our airwaves open to the creative energies that make good programs available, rather than allow monopolies to control what is available. I have already turned my TV off (we don't get cable where I live) and I only listen to Public Radio as it is, so I'm not going to be affected whatever you do.
